One Lone Woman Converts Bakers of Town to War Duty

Nagged Careless Users of Wheat Flour Until They Acceded to Her Demands for Mixing Patriotism in Their Loaf—Feeds 230 School Girls on New Breads

By Jules C. Underwood

To her a "negro" for weeks past, the bakers of the little town of St. Charles, Mo., have been more or less menaced by the menace of a little woman who, with a stern and uncompromising spirit, has compelled them to change their methods of bread-making. She is not a native of the town, nor is she a boulangerie; but she is a woman who, for months past, has been making bread for the soldiers of the United States Army, and who, with a persistence that is almost incredible, has succeeded in changing the bread-making habits of the bakers of St. Charles.

The woman is Mrs. Jules C. Underwood, who lives in a small house on the outskirts of St. Charles, and who, for many years past, has been engaged in the bread-making business. She is a woman of decided character, and is not easily impressed by the arguments of others. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily impressed by any sort of argument, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.

The bakers of St. Charles, who are a hardy and independent lot, have been somewhat taken aback by this new development, and have not been slow to express their displeasure. But Mrs. Underwood is not easily discouraged, and has persisted in her efforts to get the bakers to change their methods of bread-making. She has been persistent, and has not been slow to express her displeasure. She is, in fact, a woman who is not easily discouraged, and who is not easily swayed by the opinions of others.